

It stuck with me that the campers look up to me. They will do anything I do, so I focus on making it great.

I saw a CIT give up his seat for a camper. I learned it is very important to put the campers before yourself, ALWAYS.

I figured out how to get to know someone quickly and be able to keep them talking about what they love to do.

I learned everyone has good sides. You just need to find them.

I found out how to tough through being tired... grit feels good.

I learned how important it is to do all I ask of my campers, whether leading a game and playing full out or seeking out someone who needs a friend.

I discovered including everyone in activities helps them connect.

I found out all the campers want to be CITs.

Finding ways for people to shine is always a really good thing.

I found out why it's important to keep everyone focused and listening to directions.

Even if I'm not with a group of my friends, I can still have fun — turns out it's easy to meet new people.

It stuck with me — I have a powerful voice and the opportunity to help build others' confidence and empower them.
